WHAT DOES A CLINICAL LABORATORY SCIENTIST DO?

Clinical laboratory scientists develop and conduct laboratory tests in support of patient medical care and research. They analyze blood, tissue and body fluid samples using sophisticated technology and analytical techniques. They often work in the forefront of health care, involved in developing new diagnostic procedures and supervising research projects. They draw on strong problem-solving skills and attention to precision and detail in their work, providing a foundation for many critical decisions made in the health care community.

John Ko is a Clinical Laboratory Scientist at the University of Michigan Blood Bank Laboratory where he performs manual and automated testing to determine blood types and identify antibodies. He also prepares blood components for transfusion, ensuring their compatibility with patients. John was drawn to the profession by the science foundation and educational opportunities the degree provides. He appreciates how the profession “is centered around quality health care provided by teamwork.” He describes the clinical internship portion of the program at WSU as a major strength: “The variety of hospital affiliations allowed us placement in laboratories that met our personalities and professional goals. The internship also helped to make the transition from student to professional an easy one.”
