WHAT DOES A PHARMACIST DO?

Pharmacists have traditionally filled prescriptions for people by mixing and dispensing medicines. But today, they are also involved in pharmaceutical care, in which they work with physicians to provide drug therapy to patients. They interact closely with patients and health-care providers - a job that requires not only science and math, but also strong communication and problem-solving skills.

WHY A DOCTORATE IN PHARMACY?

“The opportunity to work closely with both patients and other health care providers initially drew me to the pharmacy profession. As I learned more, the dynamic responsibilities of a clinical pharmacist confirmed the appeal of both the program and career.”
